

Concert policy questions fielded by representatives

Over 200 students, along with a panel composed of student government representatives and administrative personnel, met Tuesday night in Corbett Center to discuss the issue of banning rock concerts on campus.

The panel was composed of Barbara Hubbard, program advisor; Paul Cowan, director of Corbett Center; Brad Cates, ASNMSU president; Mike Rogers, past treasurer of ASNMSU; Georgiana Fellis, ASNMSU activities vice president; and Philip Ambrose, vice president of student affairs.

Following a presentation of the issue by each panel member, the panel was open for questions.

Students fired questions concerning football games, western dances and other campus activities to the panel, topping it off with a showing of almost 250 empty beer, wine and liquor bottles which were collected at Memorial Stadium Sunday morning following Saturday's UTEP game.

Panel members and students agreed that if concerts were banned because of "illegal activities," then all other campus activities should be banned which also involve "illegal activities."

Students talked about the inconsistency in policing activities, especially at other activities other than rock concerts.

Cates brought up the point that rock concerts have not been banned on campus. We are just trying to invent some type of control over the smoking and drinking during performances," he added.

Another meeting was scheduled for last night in which Los Chicanos and Block and Bridle were believed to have attended, however, details and information were not available at press time.
